Not illustrated. 1902 Excerpt: .and she was judicious as well as good-tempered in submitting to the inevitable, and by this means generally succeeded in getting her own way. Once only did she evade his orders, in the matter of drawing up the conditions relative to the proposal of marriage made by the Empress of Russia, regarding an alliance between the future Czar, and one of the Landgraf's daughters. Here Caroline made use of a woman's ruse to prevent the ridiculous and inflated proposals of the Landgraf reaching the Russian Court. For the rest she always kept on terms with her exigent husband and wrote to him every day.¹ At a distance she seems to have had more influence over her strange husband than at close quarters, and succeeded in inducing him to summon Friedrich von Moser to Darmstadt in the capacity of Minister. His social reforms caused widespread astonishment. In the end Moser was dismissed and persecuted. The Landgräfin, however, believed in him and only in her later days said that he was a traitor. The correspondence between the Landgräfin and the statesman lasted for years, and is a wonderful record--not more wonderful, however, than the immense correspondence of the period. No one who was born in the eighteenth century could escape the craze of the day, letter writing. I know one should be duly grateful that this craze--I can find no other word ¹ The Landgraf was not so insensible to his wife's merits as he...
