The name of New England seems to be a favorite one in wool circles, and to those of our readers who are not well acquainted with the best growing districts in Australia, we should like briefly to mention the leading characteristics of the raw material grown in that part of New South Wales. The writer has often said that, if he were to emigrate to Australia, that would be the district he would choose to settle in, because nature seems to have specially favored that part of the premier State. We have long been familiar with the district, and can speak of its excellent climate and pasture. The incoming mail brings particulars of the sale of many New England clips in Sydney, and undoubtedly they have made very creditable prices. Right from. Tamworth to Tenterfield is a splendid area for the merino, and the class of wool the sheep grow ranks as one of the best in New South Wales. The country is somewhat hilly, and on that account provides a different bite of grass from what we find upon the hot rolling plains of the Riverina or the red sandy soil of the Far West. The wool itself presents a far different appearance from that grown upon the districts named, and being produced upon black soil, it possesses all the leading characteristics which wool invariably does when it is grown upon such country. There are several well-known stations in New England. Some...
