Brand New Book ***** Print on Demand *****.Excerpt from Sketches of Early Milton On the historical map of Milton in Mr. Teele s history of the town, may be traced an old road leading from the Blue Hills and Brush Hill down to tide water at the Lower Mills. When Brush Hill Road was laid out by the town in 167 G, reference was made to the Beaten Rode already in existence. Tradition has given this as the trail or pathway made by the Indians in their journeyings from the Blue Hills down to fishing and trapping grounds on the Neponset river, long before the white man had come upon the scene. The first settlers made use of these Indian trails, as well as to beat out new paths for themselves, and the future highways were laid out over these early passage ways where they proved convenient. Brush Hill road thus preserved the general route of the trail, to the ox pen, which was an enclosure for the convenience of the cattle owners on both the Dorchester and Milton sides of the Neponset. It was situated near where Brook Road now crosses the Parkway. Although much of this region was a wilderness, there was some good grazing land. Here the oxen and steers were pastured and attended by two herdsmen, whose duty it was to herd the animals, and drive them into this pen, one half hour before sunset. (Record Commissioners, Vol. IV., p. 62.)Their owners could then come and take them home, or leave them there for the night, as suited their convenience. In laying out the early roads in this part of the town the oxpen is frequently mentioned as the point...
